The arrival at New-York.

The ship sailed past the Rock of Gibraltar, the Azores; across the vast wastes of the Atlantic Ocean where, by night, phosphorus gilds the waves and, by day, spray lines them with a crystal fringe. Once more, sea-gulls appeared above the masts shrieking and diving in the wake of the ship... Two days later New-York rose out of the mist; roofs above roofs, as though elbowing each other in a desperate effort to touch the sky. The sun was setting. A great liner glided out to sea, tugs hooted, ferries carried trains across the water, swift motor boats skimmed round them in mad circles, flags fluttered - Land again. How green the grass looked. Passengers pressed against the deck rails, some going home, some merely travelling, many come to build a golden future. The band played. Hats were straightened, addresses exchanged, handkerchiefs waved. The boat bumped against the dock. The blue days were over.
