The road, lined with silver birch, by which they had been travelling by motor-car was left behind. A small town appeared ahead. He drove on, through the town, past the bridge spanning the river.

The town died away into a straggle of white cottages and soon they were in the open country again, the broad river on their left and, on their right, fine-clad hills, a heavy green, cut by blocks of gold. The river bent sharply, and on either hand were steep mountains that carried the eye upward to a still, empty sky; the river vanished, a great avenue of planes shut out the sky until suddenly the valley opened on a mass of silver birch. Soon another village appeared ahead of him which seemed asleep and the more asleep because in one of its higher windows was a piece of red material, perhaps a petticoat, which hung, limp and dead, on the sunlit wall as though it had been forgotten.
