had soon fuished	The harvest. The farmer and his sous were in the fields, husy harvesting. There were already several hours that they sworked junder the scorching sum. Tather Smith standing in the wag gon, a prong in the hand pitched the heavy out sheaves to one of his sous, who built a rick all near; more this rick grew, more it leaned towards The wag gon, but it was unimportant. Tather and son did tose their timeschattering and nothing holse into the silence, only the rushing of the sheaves and some fest that they exchanged now and they. They had soon finished made finishing the rick; they stopped the work, and they went to the farm for milking the cour and reperhing themselves
