A poor small wren who had been driven along by the squall in the masts of a ship bound to Japan had fallen upon the deck, where he would have surely starved to death if a passenger had not brought him down in his cabin. The strange small bird was soon restored thanks to the attentive pains given by Kipling - for such was the name of the passenger's name. Before taking back again his flight to Saint Paul, he was desirous to insist upon his gratitude by telling him the sea catch's story.

He was a big white seal whose body covered with a thick fur bore so many scars that it seemed more prudent avoiding the such fellow's long tooth. He spent one month lighting furiously
