Without letters there is no knowing the history, manners, customs of life of ^{different} periods. There are some qualities that make the letters not even agreeable to read but very much interesting, these qualities are clearness, native ease, gracefulness, and simplicity; but the art of writing letters ~~does not~~ comes not to its full growth at all the periods of history. The Ancients, the Greeks have left no letters that are interesting to speak of, because there was no life of society, but we have many letters of the roman literature those of Cicero, of Pliny, of Seneca. I have read some of the two ^{former} first writers - Cicero's correspondence gives no information of the writer himself, his family, his friends. Pliny's letters are full of lightness, delicacy.
